CURRENT RESEARCH

Book Manuscript

Micro-institutional Foundations of Capitalism: The Globalization of China, India, and Russia, under preparation for review at Cambridge University Press.

Everyone assumes that there is a model to explain transition economies in the context of internationalization, which is not the case. The book introduces a new model of the nature and scope of economic transitions in the developing world in the context of economic internationalization. It uncovers the structural impact of institutional arrangements and sectoral characteristics ignored in prevailing interest-based assumptions of open economy politics, and explores the ideational and value laden beliefs motivating market governance structures. The book's strategic value framework assesses how the nature of a country's market governance structures, which vary by industry within nation, affect the ways in which transition economies simultaneously industrialize and integrate into the global economy. National sector-specific patterns of market governance, with its coordination and property rights dimensions, are the micro-institutional foundations of transition economies' models of capitalism.
